

SSG: Putting the “standards” into Air Force Standard Systems

The Standard Systems Group is the Information Technology (IT) Center of Excellence for the Warfighter.

There are five information system program offices that support the operational Air Force by sustaining 61 secure combat information systems across logistics, contracting, finance, medical and operations. The group designs, builds or buys, installs, integrates and supports information systems necessary to provide the warfighter the right combat support information in the right place at the right time, agile combat support. These systems are used by more than 250,000 active duty Air Force, Air Reserve, Air National Guard and other Defense Department users at more than 200 operational locations, both in garrison and deployed, around the world.

A “standard system” is an information system used by two or more major commands, with a common set of business processes and policies; supported by a common Information Technology (IT) solution under centralized configuration management. By standardizing Air Force information systems the Air Force avoids duplication of training, activities common to all users, cycle time, reduces sustainment costs, and total cost of ownership.
